General Description

INTPs love to solve problems, and the bigger and more theoretical the problems, the more they enjoy it. INTPs want to understand their world in an honest way, so they challenge existing expert opinion until they have satisfied themselves that it is true. There are times when this intellectual honesty is mistaken for rebellion. INTPs hold intelligence in high esteem and will usually do well in school. However, they may not achieve high grades in particular courses if they lose respect for the subject matter or the teacher. INTPs make quiet friends who value their independence.

INTP Ideal Work Environment

- Likes recognition for ideas and intellectual competencies
- Enjoys tasks which involve problem solving, innovation and long-range planning
- Prefers environments that allow independence and flexibility
- Sees big picture and builds conceptual frameworks or systems
- Likes new challenges and new ideas; are architects of change
- Like opportunities to demonstrate their subject matter expertise

This personality profile is based on the work of C.G. Jung, whose theories principally developed popular psychometric instrument, the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator. Jung proposed that people have personality preferences similar to being right- or left-handed. Understanding personality preferences can provide insight into your behaviour and help with decision-making.

What do the letters mean?

First Preference: Extraversion or Introversion (E or I)

People with a preference for Extraversion focus their attention outwards and are drawn to the external world of action. They tend to be more talkative and their interests more varied.

People with a preference for Introversion focus their attention inwards and are drawn to the inner world of understanding. They tend to be more thoughtful and their interests are deeper.

Second Preference: Sensing or iNtuition (S or N)

People with a preference for Sensing learn about their world through experience. Because they focus on what they have seen or heard or touched, they develop a practical and realistic outlook on the world.

People with a preference for iNtuition go beyond their direct experience and focus on the meaning of the information. This gives them a "big picture" outlook on life and they tend to be more creative and innovative.

Third Preference: Thinking or Feeling (T or F)

People with a preference for Thinking make decisions based on impersonal criteria like principles and logic. They apply the same rules to everyone making them fair and businesslike, asking: "Is this decision logical? Can I support the decision with facts?"

People with a preference for Feeling make decisions based on their own personal values. Because they treat everyone individually, they tend to be more empathetic and compassionate, asking: "How do I feel about this decision? What will be the consequences for those involved?"

Fourth Preference: Judging or Perceiving (J or P)

People with a preference for Judging are not necessarily judgmental; rather they want their lives to be predictable so they make decisions quickly. Judging-types tend to be organized.

People with a preference for Perceiving want their lives to be open to new experiences so they postpone decisions. Perceiving-types tend to be spontaneous.
