- Feels everyone should share in responsibilities and duties
- Thrives on routines, procedures, structure and order
- Places an emphasis on accountability and responsibility
- Demonstrates punctuality, dependability and respect for rules

This personality profile is based on the work of C.G. Jung, whose theories principally developed popular psychometric instrument, the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator. Jung proposed that people have personality preferences similar to being right- or left-handed. Understanding personality preferences can provide insight into your behaviour and help with decision-making.

What do the letters mean?

First Preference: Extraversion or Introversion (E or I)

People with a preference for Extraversion focus their attention outwards and are drawn to the external world of action. They tend to be more talkative and their interests more varied.

People with a preference for Introversion focus their attention inwards and are drawn to the inner world of understanding. They tend to be more thoughtful and their interests are deeper.

Second Preference: Sensing or iNtuition (S or N)

People with a preference for Sensing learn about their world through experience. Because they focus on what they have seen or heard or touched, they develop a practical and realistic outlook on the world.

People with a preference for iNtuition go beyond their direct experience and focus on the meaning of the information. This gives them a "big picture" outlook on life and they tend to be more creative and innovative.

Third Preference: Thinking or Feeling (T or F)

People with a preference for Thinking make decisions based on impersonal criteria like principles and logic. They apply the same rules to everyone making them fair and businesslike, asking: "Is this decision logical? Can I support the decision with facts?"

People with a preference for Feeling make decisions based on their own personal values. Because they treat everyone individually, they tend to be more empathetic and compassionate, asking: "How do I feel about this decision? What will be the consequences for those involved?"

Fourth Preference: Judging or Perceiving (J or P)

People with a preference for Judging are not necessarily judgmental; rather they want their lives to be predictable so they make decisions quickly. Judging-types tend to be organized.

People with a preference for Perceiving want their lives to be open to new experiences so they postpone decisions. Perceiving-types tend to be spontaneous.
