General Description

ISTPs are interested in everything that goes on around them. They pay attention to details and make sense of it all because they are very logical. They are often good problem-solvers because they try new ways of approaching the problem and notice the little things that others may have overlooked. In fact, solving problems is one of their strong points. From a practical point of view, they are interested in knowing how things work and enjoy fixing things. They take a hands-on approach to solving realistic questions.

ISTP Ideal Work Environment

- Performs well in competitive and action-oriented situations
- Needs freedom from controls and supervision
- Prefers unstructured and flexible work environments
- Excels in contests and 'hands on' activities
- Learns by doing and putting new skills to immediate use
- Gives direct answers and responds quickly to questions

This personality profile is based on the work of C.G. Jung, whose theories principally developed popular psychometric instrument, the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator. Jung proposed that people have personality preferences similar to being right- or left-handed. Understanding personality preferences can provide insight into your behaviour and help with decision-making.

What do the letters mean?

First Preference: Extraversion or Introversion (E or I)

People with a preference for Extraversion focus their attention outwards and are drawn to the external world of action. They tend to be more talkative and their interests more varied.

People with a preference for Introversion focus their attention inwards and are drawn to the inner world of understanding. They tend to be more thoughtful and their interests are deeper.

Second Preference: Sensing or iNtuition (S or N)

People with a preference for Sensing learn about their world through experience. Because they focus on what they have seen or heard or touched, they develop a practical and realistic outlook on the world.

People with a preference for iNtuition go beyond their direct experience and focus on the meaning of the information. This gives them a "big picture" outlook on life and they tend to be more creative and innovative.

Third Preference: Thinking or Feeling (T or F)

People with a preference for Thinking make decisions based on impersonal criteria like principles and logic. They apply the same rules to everyone making them fair and businesslike, asking: "Is this decision logical? Can I support the decision with facts?"

People with a preference for Feeling make decisions based on their own personal values. Because they treat everyone individually, they tend to be more empathetic and compassionate, asking: "How do I feel about this decision? What will be the consequences for those involved?"

Fourth Preference: Judging or Perceiving (J or P)

People with a preference for Judging are not necessarily judgmental; rather they want their lives to be predictable so they make decisions quickly. Judging-types tend to be organized.

People with a preference for Perceiving want their lives to be open to new experiences so they postpone decisions. Perceiving-types tend to be spontaneous.
